

TOMORROW, AND TOMORROW, AND TOMORROW

- How did you feel about the way video games were tied into the story as a whole?
 - How did you feel about the “gaming language” woven in?
 - As a lot of us are “gamers”, were there any games mentioned that interested you?
- What are your feelings towards Sam, Sadie, and Marx and how did they change over the course of the story?
 - What did you think about Sam and Sadie’s friendship?
 - Sam and Marx?
 - Dov and Sadie?
- Marx often acts as the emotional center of the group. How different do you think Sam and Sadie’s relationship would have been without him?
- Sam and Sadie have quite a few arguments over the book. Do you feel that they were justified? Would you have handled them differently?
- The novel explores many different kinds of love. Which relationship felt like the heart of the story to you?
- Oh boy. What did you think of the NPC chapter?
- At what point in the Pioneers game did you realize one (or both) of the characters Sadie was talking to was Sam?
 - Do you think Sadie is justified in being upset with Sam after this?
- Do you think Sam and Sadie were ever meant to be together romantically, or was their relationship stronger because it wasn’t?
- What did you make of the part in Pioneers where LQ swims to the edge of the sea but can’t make it back?
- In the Freights and Grooves chapter, Sadie seems to forgive Dov much quicker and more easily than she “forgives” Sam. What did you make of this? Did you find this realistic?
- Why do you think Sam and Sadie have such a difficult time communicating with each other, despite understanding each other so well in other ways?
- We don’t hear much about Naomi after she is born. Why do you think this is?
- How did you feel about the way the story ended?
- Were there any parts of the book you felt like were done really well?
 - Were there any quotes that you highlighted or kept thinking about after the fact?
- Do you have any criticisms of the book?
